Excerpt: . . . relative care, nonrelative care could be provided in the childs home or in the home of the caregiver. 16 percent had center-based care as their primary arrangement. This includes care provided in places such as early learning centers, nursery schools, and preschools (including Early Head Start). 1 percent of children spent equal numbers of hours in two or more different types of care arrangements (such as 20 hours a week with a relative and 20 hours a week in a center-based program). The quality of a childs care arrangement was measured separately for children in center-based care and children in family-based care (i. e. , relative and or nonrelative care) (table 6): as measured by ratings on the Infant Toddler Environment Rating Scale (ITERS), 9 percent of children with center-based arrangements were in low-quality care, 66 percent were in medium-quality (i. e. , adequate) care, and 24 percent were in high-quality care. as measured by ratings on the Family Day Care Rating Scale (FDCRS), 36 percent of children in home-based arrangements were in low-quality care, 57 percent were in medium-quality (i. e. , adequate) care, and 7 percent were in high-quality care. Fathers in the Childrens Lives As part of the ECLS-B parent interview, information was collected on whether there was a father (biological, adoptive, step, or foster) living in the household. If there was no biological father who resided in the household, information was collected on...
